Chinese Food Cultural Profile

Food is an important part of daily life in China. The Chinese shop every day so that they can get fresh food. This means choosing from swimming fish, snappy crabs and squawking chickens. The people in China are more concerned with the food's texture, flavour, colour and aroma than its nutritional value.

The Chinese culture believes that there is a positive energy and a negative energy in the universe. 'Yin' represents the negative energy and 'Yang' represents the positive energy. These energies have to be balanced for a person to stay healthy. Foods belonging to the 'Yin' are known as cold food. Those belonging to the 'Yang' are hot food.

The Chinese hardly waste any section of the animal and have found ways to cook nearly every part. They believe that by using any shape or part of the animal, the same part of the human body can be strengthened or healed. For example, shark fin soup and bird's nest soup (bird's saliva) is served to increase the appetite, crocodile meat strengthens the lungs, while monkey brains add wisdom.
