How the Buffalo Lost the War

The homeland of the Pawnee Tribe stretched across vast prairies. Millions of buffalo ranged there. Buffalo meat and hide gave the Pawnees food, clothing and shelter. The Pawnees have a legend about the buffalo.

It was almost winter. A field mouse ventured out of her nest of dried grass in the small prairie meadow. She sniffed the crisp, tangy air. Instinct told her that the north wind was soon to arrive and it would sweep the prairie with its frost-tipped wings. It was time, she thought, to gather her food.

While she searched busily for wild beans in the tall grass, a buffalo bull came to the meadow to graze. The sight of this huge, shaggy beast alarmed the mouse. She was afraid that he would eat most of the grass and mow down the rest with his hooves and rough tongue. The mouse was also concerned that as a result of this, she would have no place left to hide.

"Hi there big fellow," squeaked the mouse. "Welcome to the meadow. Be so kind as to save a small patch for me," she pleaded.

The buffalo did not take any notice of her and continued munching on a mouthful of grass.

The mouse was about to repeat her request when she saw the beast step on her nest.

"Whow!" she shrieked, her whiskers bristling. "You've destroyed my nest! Leave this meadow at once or I'll challenge you to war!" she demanded.

The buffalo looked down on the mouse with scorn. "You foolish little thing," he snorted. "You are far too small to wage a war with me, a mighty giant!"

A moment later, the buffalo felt a tickle inside his right ear. He shook his head from side to side and twitched his ears. But the tickly feeling only increased. The poor beast began running around in circles. Then the buffalo stopped abruptly. Out jumped the mouse.

The buffalo was most surprised. "So it's you!" he exclaimed. "Have you no respect for mighty giants?" he asked. He then lowered his head and charged at the mouse. She was quick to respond and sprang on top of the buffalo's head.

Once more the beast felt the maddening tickle. He bellowed with rage, pawed the air with his front hooves and tore up the grass with his sharp horns. He then wheeled about and galloped towards a rocky hillside. He finally stopped in the valley below. The mouse leapt out of his ear victoriously. "So now who has won?" she cheekily challenged the buffalo. There was no reply, for the buffalo sped off into the distance.
